Families traveling with kids tend to spend a majority of their time on-property, so it's important for parents to find resorts that don't just accept children, but that truly welcome them.

"All-inclusive resorts are incredibly popular with families, but they're not all created equal," says Lissa Poirot, editor of Family Vacation Critic. "Families traveling with kids tend to spend a majority of their time on-property, so it's important for parents to find resorts that don't just accept children, but that truly welcome them. Resorts that we classify as being especially family-friendly are those with spacious accommodations, extensive kids' programming and available childcare services."
